Designed on a hexagonal module, Kentuck Knob is a one-story Usonian house - a signature design of Wright. Both dramatic and serene, the house is situated just below the crest of a hill and appears almost as part of the mountain itself. An open floor plan, cantilevered overhangs and great expanses of glass effortlessly integrate the inside with the outside.

This community and its people embraced yet another tragedy one year apart. This time, the first nine miners were spared the 77 long hours underground and the nine trapped miners, with amazing fortitude, were safely rescued as the nation watched. A Welcome Center holds artifacts including the actual yellow rescue capsule and clothing. The story is the story!
